

This is the entrance to one of the dugouts in the American trenches on the Lorraine front. Here the men retire for safety when the Germans start a bombardment, leaving sentries to keep watch in case the Hun comes over the top.

Copyright, 1918, Committee on Public Information.

Another scene in the trenches, showing three Americans keeping track of happenings across No Man's Land and ready for eventualities.

Copyright, 1918, Committee on Public Information.

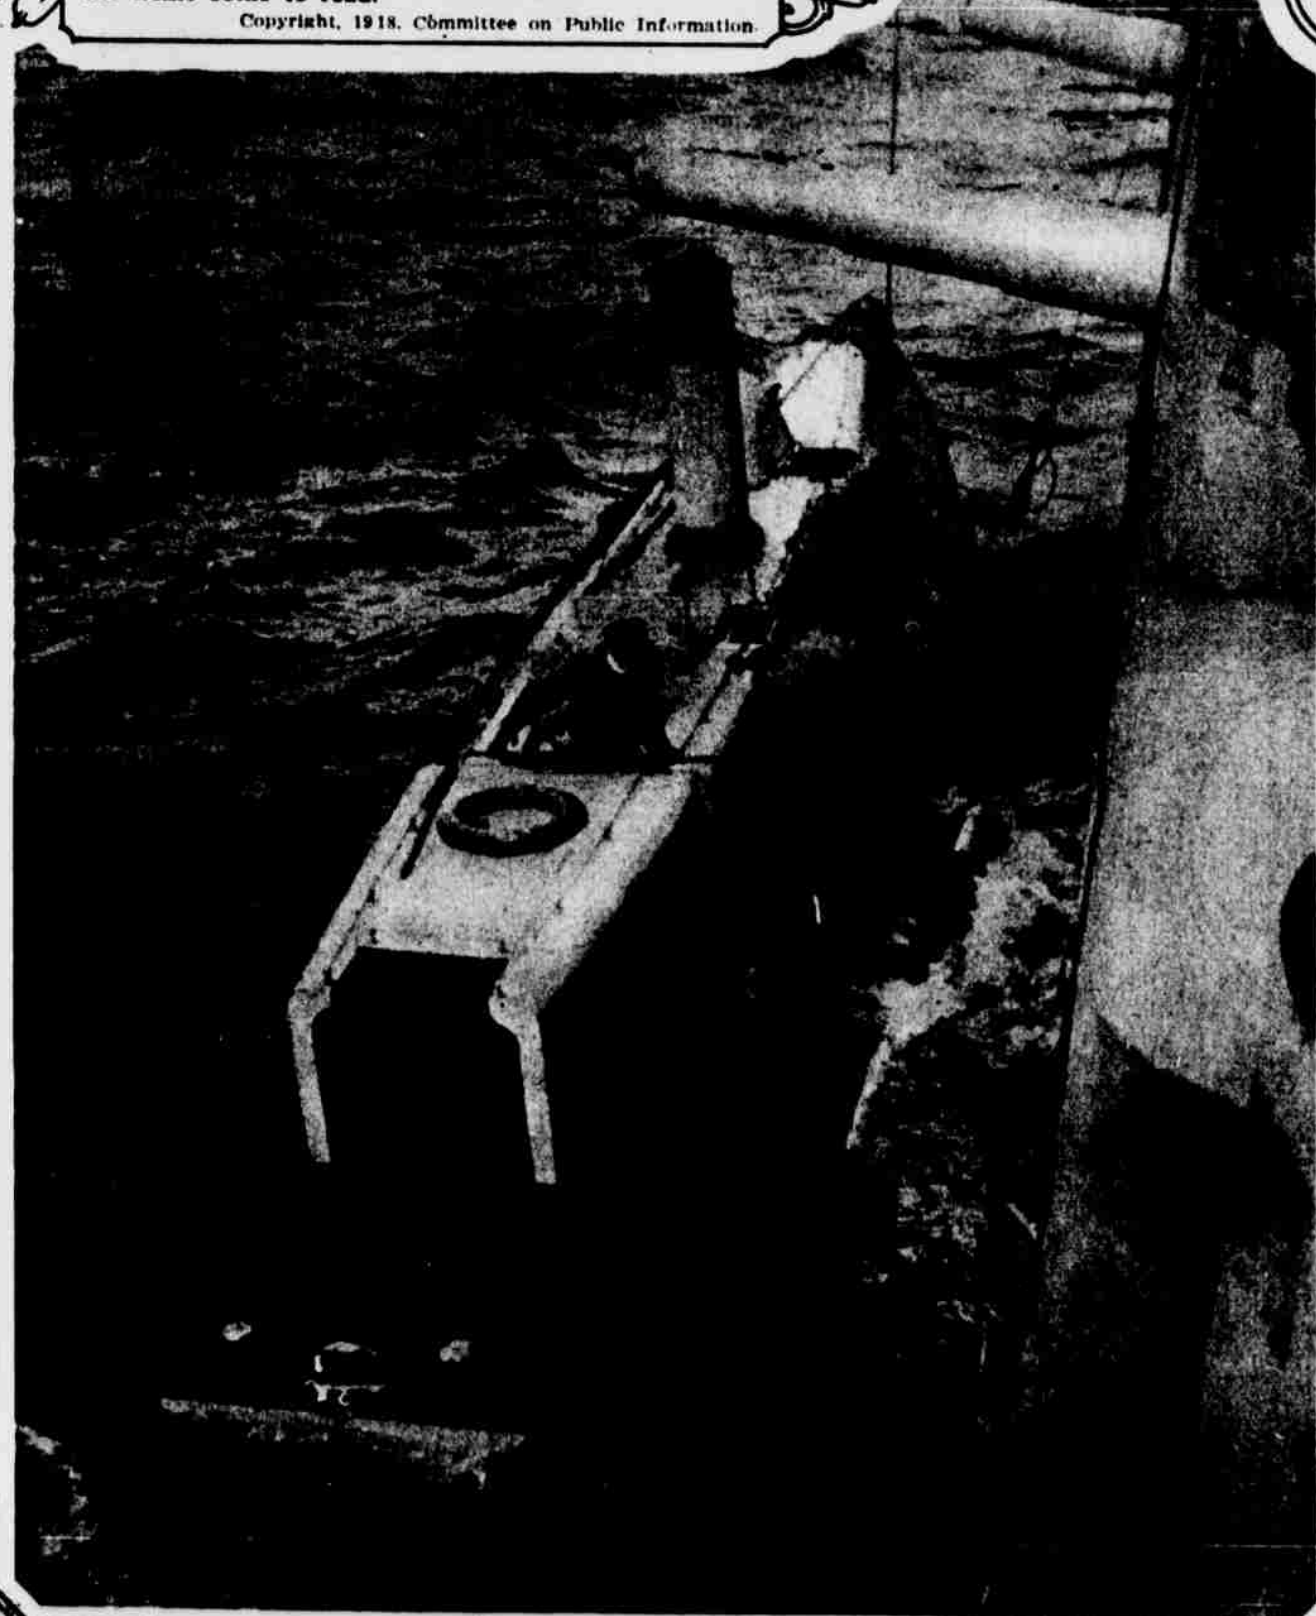

A publicity man at work in unusual surroundings. Sergeant Carl Detrich of the X— Regiment, United States Marines, getting up a batch of camp news for the home folks to read.

Copyright, 1918, Committee on Public Information.

Major-Gen. Charles T. Menoher shows another officer the correct way to carry gas mask equipment.

Copyright, 1918, Committee on Public Information.

This picture and the one on the right were taken from a suspected German sailor since interned in this country as a dangerous enemy alien. They show two phases of battle manoeuvres of the German fleet in Kiel harbor. Here a small boat is returning to a battleship a spent torpedo discharged at a target.

Copyright Press Illustrating Service.

In this photograph the torpedo is being hoisted aboard, while an officer directs the dangerous operation. If the nose of the missile should strike the armored side an explosion would probably result. Pictures of Kiel are extremely rare these days and these were found sewn in the sailor's uniform.

Copyright Press Illustrating Service.